

The Renovated Church.

provide these for a well-proportioned Chancel, 25 feet long by  $17\frac{1}{2}$  ft. wide, opening into the Nave with a lofty chancel-arch, and on the north and south sides with like arches into organ-chamber and Vestry, and to a lateral aisle respectively. The Chancel is a Memorial, and the last-named feature, which it gives additional seating room, would be specially suitable as a kind of Gallery for monuments or memorials of the founders.

"The parishioners' addition to the Church consists of a southern Aisle  $37\frac{1}{2}$  ft. long and 21 ft. wide, and giving 200 additional seats. It opens into the Nave with three lofty pointed arches; and gives additional architectural character and interest to the hitherto plain square building. There remains the Nave of the somewhat unusual proportion of 65 ft. of length to  $30\frac{1}{2}$  ft. in breadth, to be brought into architectural character, with a low-pitched roof, which it would not be desirable to raise higher. It was at first proposed merely to remove the ceiling, and case up the old roof and make it as fairly presentable as possible. By the additional generosity of the Baroness von Szegey, however, a new roof, and a hemidome one, is found; and the Architect has met the difficulties of proportion by adopting a treatment in the manner of 15th Century architecture, which lends itself to lower pitched roofs and wider spans. The roofs of the Nave, Aisle, and Chancel are accordingly
